Mark marked it as to-read Jan 04, All sympathetic observers of children must be impressed, I imagine, by the evident mental stress and concentration which often accompanies their endeavors, whether imitative or not, and is followed, as in adults, by the appearance of relief when the action has come off successfully. The belief that many people seem to have that infants respond to smiling is possibly due to the fact that when a grown-up person appears, both he and the infant are likely to smile, each at the other; but although the smiles are simultaneous one need not be the cause of the other, and many observations lead me to think that it makes no difference to the infant whether the grown-up person smiles or not. Most are carefully selected abroad. It is a lucrative enterprise indeed, for those who can rise to the role of arbiters of cultural acceptability. Prominent among those features is a natural bias toward one's own kind and a certain wariness of others, making harmony in multi-ethnic societies problematic at best.
