So we are always in the realm of the strange, it. An explanation should be something that we humans, with our extraordinarily powerful minds, can comprehend.

Theism and naturalism are contrasted with respect to furnishing an adequate explanation of the world. If a person believes that the natural world is simply a non-moral machine with no moral purposiveness then that person would have no reason to believe that moral action could succeed because there is no a priori reason to think moral action will achieve the highest good and little empirical reason to believe this. What ought to be understood concerning anything, is first of all, whether it exists. God is not necessary for the existence of the world, or actions of, the world. The Argument from Suffering 1.
