We become obsessed, in a new way, by what is missing in our lives; and by what sabotages the pleasures that we seek. The trials and tribulations of wanting are born of frustration; to choose one thing may involve frustrating ourselves of something. Because we are always shadowed by the possibility of not getting what we want, we learn, at best, to ironize our wishes – that is, to call our wants wishes: a wish is only a wish until, as we say, it comes true – and, at worst, to hate our needs.
