For example, someone at the mythic level of awareness might interpret a subtle experience as a realm filled with gods and goddesses, whereas someone at the mental level might interpret it in a more rational way, such as a vision of the deep meaning of the cosmos. I stopped reading him at that point, and have only recently looked at his more recent work Phase IV and V basically through the Web and reviews, and more recently a few books themselves that I bought. His example is using Electrocardiogram machines and other technologies to test the experiences of meditators and other spiritual practitioners. Adi Da as well as other theorists including Sri Aurobindo Visser also write the second edition will, but only when Wilber-5 has crystallised sufficiently - which is a bit difficult for a book that appeared in Dutch. I quite enjoyed his work at the time, and was absolutely impressed by the great scholarship and huge list of references, and the way he integrated the stages of the various theories of psychological and spiritual development into a single unified paradigm. This would be an example of what Wilber calls "integral science". It was not the psychedelics then in vogue which inspired .
